confidence in our government and for a good reason: they're lying to us. While it's true that the president of the United States doesn't release his tax returns, we have a president who is so noxious to the political and intelligence establishment that he has to get creative. A bill introduced into Congress last week would effectively give the president unfettered executive power to reclassify intelligence programs and other sensitive matters. Without fear of oversight, not only does this president have unbridled power, but any president who doesn't want his name in the headlines can do the same thing. You'd think that the targeting and internment of millions of innocent people around the world would be a spark for outrage, but the mainstream media is more concerned with political theater than with the very real-world repercussions of the United States government operating under totalitarian dictatorial powers. After a year or two of normalization, the civilized world is now largely inured to the reality of the secret surveillance programs of the NSA. We might occasionally be shocked by a story in the New York Times, but we don't

I consider this to be part of the library ecosystem, but it should be released eventually. I'll call it nopt, although it's no longer a package manager. Why, you ask? How does something named nopt contribute to Node.js? nopt is a Node.js configuration system that provides extensible shorthands for common arguments in Node.js applications. All it does is provide a set of aliases for common arguments, allowing developers to specify Node.js applications in shorthands, such as the typical `opt` for `optparse`. Instead of doing more CLI parsing and parsing over configuration, you just specify it in the CLI's shorthands, and it knows what to do. You could use the CLI's shorthands for more than just configuration, though. We've been doing this for a while and it's called `options`. This might seem similar to `nopt`
