A new platform game with game mechanics: One of the things not everyone likes is that when you are playing the game, it gets boring again and again. You play until he's a little bit more tired, and so you need to click, click and click. This game avoids that and lets you do something else while playing. In this game you play a little turtle and you have to work your way through a labyrinth. However, your path is blocked by platforms which need to be crossed. But now it's not you, it's the platform. It's true, the platform has a brain and that's what the game plays with. How does it work? It tries to keep you safe from the platforms and protect you from collisions. But you have to discover it because you have a certain goal you have to reach. And if there are no difficulties left, the labyrinth will be completed and then a new one will begin. So it's a game where you can do something else while playing. And it can also be played online. It's a game for everyone! Game Features: * Gameplay with a retro-style * One of the most difficult mobile games * Simple game controls with a game mechanic * Game Play in one chapter * The game tracks your game progress * Works online in-game and to play with players worldwide * Works offline (save game) * Completes the game for you * Achievements A new platform game with game mechanics: One of the things not everyone likes is that when you are playing the game, it gets boring again and again. Touch the Ship and the controls will begin, if you touch it in the air, you will fall into the water, to destroy it.

ial Gravity denial is the belief that it is possible to escape gravitational forces by jumping upward. In popular media, gravity denial has been described as "people attempting to fly," "euphoric but illegal" and "a perpetual rip-off of the movie Gravity." Gravity denial is an example of the more general concept of surmounting an illusion using the fringe science of alternative medicine and studying gravity itself. To this end, people have been promoting the "gravitational vacation," the "grav-incident," and the "anti-gravity". Tests and experiments have shown that animals cannot jump from a height with enough velocity to counteract gravity. This is called the Newton's Third Law of action and reaction. History William Ayrton first presented papers at the St. Andrews Mathematical Recreations Society in 1901 in which the Law of the Falling Body was presented under the name

Newton's third law of action and reaction. It was called the "law that the law that the acceleration is conserved." Ayrton proposed that a gravitational body can, via high speed traveling upwards, counteract the force of gravity. Ayrton predicted that a body falling free of any other mechanical constraint will travel up a chimney 43 miles high to the highest point and so on, or alternatively up to the moon, and that such traveling is not possible due to conservation of linear momentum and conservation of angular momentum. In the 1950s, Ayrton gave an interview to the New Scientist in which he discussed the possibility of escaping gravity. "I don't know. I think the idea's quite ridiculous," he said. "I have tried it in the laboratory, though quite successfully I may say, and I have made remarks for life in some newspapers—in the Daily Express, for example." The New Scientist published this interview, writing "These experiments are the most marvellous achievement in physics since that of the Higgs." In January 2015, the Italian Mathematician Piero Mastrolia, a friend of Ayrton, shared his theories in a Facebook post. Mastrolia believed gravity is an illusion. Mastrolia claimed that James Cook had successfully jumped to the moon in 1769 in the full light of day and sighted it, which was witnessed by a French officer and all of Cook's crew who confirmed this incident. A year later in June 2017, Mastrolia took a trip by lift to the top of Cotopaxi, Vol
