* Adobe Photoshop CS6 provides many advanced features such as Smart Objects, Camera RAW, Global Adjustments, the History Panel, and many others. But there are always times when we need to get the basics right. ## Introduction to Photoshop To start using Photoshop you'll first need to open your image in Photoshop by double-clicking on the file on your hard drive. To adjust the picture, simply double-click on an area of your image and make your adjustments. You'll then need to save the image. When you're ready to print the image, you'll need to zoom in on it and make any final adjustments to the picture. You'll see a preview of your new image on the menu bar at the top. At this point, you should click File. This will open the File menu where you can adjust your chosen settings. In this chapter I'll walk you through the basics of the File menu and give you a basic grounding in the menu system. It's also possible to save your image to the File menu. This is the most common file type. Alternatively, you can choose to save it to your hard drive in a new folder using the Save menu option, called Save for Web & Devices, as shown in Figure 10-1. If you click on the Save menu option and select Save for Web & Devices from the drop-down list, Photoshop will save your file as a JPEG, and you may also want to tell it to make the file smaller. Figure 10-1 Choosing a file type to save your image to. You can also make a copy of your image using the File menu or File | Save As. To create a copy, click on the Save As menu option and choose from the drop-down list the type of file you'd like to create (JPEG, BMP, GIF, or TIFF). The most common choices are GIF and TIFF, so unless you are specifically creating an animation from a GIF or need a specific image type, you will probably stick with JPEG. ## The File Menu The File menu provides the basic controls for Photoshop. Figure 10-2 shows the main options available, although there are many more options. Simply use the Index to find the correct menu option you need. The bottom section of the File menu provides options for File, Edit

Role of neuropeptide Y in the adrenal medulla. The peptide, neuropeptide Y, plays a role in the central nervous system in the regulation of blood pressure, the control of food intake, and the control of reproductive function. Recently, immunohistochemical and biochemical studies have demonstrated the presence of neuropeptide Y in the adrenal medulla and the presence of a specific receptor on the surface of chromaffin cells. The neuropeptide Y receptor has a binding affinity for neuropeptide Y up to 10,000 times greater than that for the atypical dopamine and somatostatin receptors. Binding to these receptors leads to an increase in calcium influx in the chromaffin cells. Through the action of guanylyl cyclase-associated proteins, a cascade of intracellular events results in the increased secretion of catecholamines. The physiologic responses of the adrenal medulla and the central nervous system may be regulated by neuropeptide Y. The authors review the current literature and speculate on how neuropeptide Y may play a role in the pathophysiology of diseases of the adrenal medulla and adrenal gland.

Q: Check in flyway if database exists in any other server I wonder if it is possible to check if any other server has the same database than the current database. We cannot change the DNS to check if it works since we have many servers with the same hostname. My initial thoughts: We could add two entries in our tables (in our DB). One entry with the database name and its checksum, and another entry with the current database and its checksum. But the checksum will be visible to the users, so we can't use this. I don't see other solutions that don't change our applications. Is it possible to check if an other server has the same database without making an entry? A: This is probably a rather generic question, but I'd like to point out that: check if an other server has the same database without making an entry? Is it allowed to upload your code to a repository like GIT, just for the sake of checking? Depending on your security requirements, you may want to look at something more appropriate. The real answer is: its not possible to look into other datacenters because of the following: a certificate is signed by a certification authority, and in case of a misconfiguration (you are stuck with the certificate, so it would be more secure to not check. If you have root access you can always contact your datacenter and ask them if they have a datacenter in another country, and if so, how your data is protected. If you dont have root access, you are out of luck, especially since that datacenter is probably in a different country and who knows what laws they have.
