Conformationally restricted analogues of piperazic acid: a novel class of antagonists for the N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) receptor. Analogues of piperazic acid (PA) bearing aryl and heteroaryl groups in the rigidified backbone were synthesized and shown to be efficient blockers of the NMDA receptor. These diastereomeric compounds constitute a new class of antagonists for the NMDA receptor. As farming becomes less viable in the face of climate change, the world needs to completely rethink how to feed itself. The farmer in his field. (Photo: Subhiakhat Basudeb/Flickr) It was a chilly October day when Yasser Eidwazi and his team began their search for kernal. But when they found a patch of crop that looked promising, Eidwazi, a farmer from the Ajloun region in northern Jordan, had a reaction you might have as well. "There's no joy in harvesting, but there is on the other hand, the feeling of pride in the production of a healthy and high-quality crop," he said. Eidwazi and his team were searching for barley in the desolate desert area, an area that sits in the middle of a large salt lake that's used for irrigation, and has been planted with crops by the Jordanians in recent years. From the traditional annual wheat and barley cycles, where farmers grow wheat for the first half of the year and then harvest and store it until they need it again for the next season, to annual planting cycles where farmers start planting and harvesting the next season's crops, farmers are constantly looking for new methods of growing food. "The changes in climate and water availability that we are experiencing now are accelerating with climate change," says Sandy Coleman, a research scientist at the agricultural plant science institute at the University of California, Davis. In the past, the average temperature in the Jordan Valley has been hovering around an average of 38 degrees Fahrenheit, which made it just about impossible for farmers to grow food there, Coleman says. Today, however, the average temperature in the region is closer to 50 degrees Fahrenheit. And the soils have been hard-baked by the summer heat, but also a dangerous combination of extreme drought and heavy rainfall, Coleman says. When the rains come, there's little surface water to drain into the soil. But a layer of topsoil

3) by differentiating the role of the immune system and its target cells in the formation of normal and scar tissue. This work was supported by grants from the National Institutes of Health (AG27609) to Drs. Nahmani and August. Figures and Tables ===== ![*Response of scarring agent to a single dose of hyaluronidase.*]When injected, hyaluronidase degrades the large (100--150 million dalton) hyaluronic acid proteoglycan-rich basal matrix of scar and normal dermis to increase the concentration of free hyaluronan, in both the upper dermis and the lower dermis. Hyaluronan, in turn, recruits fibroblasts that play a crucial role in wound healing, since they are induced to produce the synthesize extracellular matrix molecules necessary for maintaining a dynamic dermal architecture and vascular response. In the absence of this hyaluronan-fibroblast interaction, the repair process is disturbed and the result is a permanent scar of inappropriate connective tissue architecture. Note that hyaluronidase increases the concentration of hyaluronan, both in the upper dermis and the lower dermis.](ar1223-1){#F1} ![*Degradation of hyaluronan to increase its concentration in the upper dermis is necessary for proper wound healing.*]Hyaluronidase fails to induce vascular proliferation to form blood vessels in the upper dermis; these blood vessels have been shown to be essential for epidermal closure and wound healing \[@B6]. In addition, hyaluronidase also fails to stimulate synthesis of the basement membrane component laminin in the upper dermis, but does have this effect in the lower dermis. These two defects in the healing response to injury explain why scars that form following injury (in the presence of hyaluronidase) are permanent because they fail to develop an epithelial closure, and are unable to adequately develop a vascular basement membrane.](ar1223-2){#F2} Q: Who are the "rightful citizens of the United States"?
