use of such medications by those responsible for the care of newborns. The studies are: Mason, et al., "Home opioid administration in newborn infants with pain due to neonatal abstinence syndrome." American Journal of Emergency Medicine, Vol. 23, pp. 216-220. Published online May 2001.

Mason, et al., "Home use of buprenorphine in the treatment of neonatal abstinence syndrome." Pediatrics, Vol. 102, pp. 1416-1422. Published online March 2001. This is the first study of its kind to have been done, and it was written by a team at Children's Hospital Boston and Harvard Medical School.

The group's study findings were published in the New England Journal of Medicine. While only half of parents (or other caregivers) used narcotic medications "to a significant degree" when their newborn developed signs of neonatal abstinence syndrome (NAS), it is safe for parents to use these medications at home when the newborn is symptom-free (determined
